Pima County Recorder Announces Remote Recording Options for Customers During Public Health Emergency

Pima County government offices are reducing public access and services due to the COVID-19 exposure threat. Pima County Recorder F. Ann Rodriguez announces that property and real estate document recording will continue by mail, via remote digital recording for those that are already set up, and limited counter service.

“Pima County’s economic engine depends on recording property-related documents,” Ms. Rodriguez says “We must keep that engine running smoothly by assisting the real estate industry, including development and construction, and the general public.”

Ms. Rodriguez states that the office has seen increased recording activity with property refinancing because of low interest rates available to borrowers. Completing paperwork related to property transactions requires those documents to be recorded with her office.

The Recorder’s Office offers several ways to record documents: in-person, by mail, and via e-recording. During the health crisis, Ms. Rodriguez urges the public to use the mail: “The first option is for the public to mail us their documents for recording instead of coming into the Recorder’s office.” She continues, “Second, for now, we will also continue to have limited counter service available for in-person recordings at our 240 N. Stone, first floor.” The office strives to keep customers and employees safe. In-person recording counters are regularly sanitized and staff observe recommended social distancing protocols to protect the public health.

The third option, e-recording, has always been the most popular. “Almost 70% of our recording activity is already done digitally, without public contact,” Rodriguez says.
